An inductor has a differentiating property, that is, when a current has been inputted to a wire, a voltage difference occurs between both ends of the wire. The inductance of an inductor is proportional to the amount of current inputted, and the inductance is inversely proportional to the amount of electric resistance of the inductor. An inductor is a core element forming a resonant circuit of a PLL (Phase-Locked Loop). Particularly, the inductor is used as an impedance element to damp an input signal or as a timing element. Also, the inductor is a part used to form a magnetic field when current is flowing in the inductor. In other words, an inductor is a part forming a magnetic field in an electric circuit. The inductor means a coil whose winding is formed using a conductor. Hereinafter, a conventional inductor, a conventional inductor fabrication method, and a conventional inductor fabrication structure will be described. A representative inductor is a solenoid type inductor. Also, the inductor has been widely used in the fields of electromagnetic devices. An inductor includes a coil configured to have a winding and a magnetic core configured to cover the coil. In this case, the magnetic core covers a winding unit formed by winding a conductor spirally and is constituted by a magnetic metal or an insulating material. Also, a magnetic metal is a material made of a magnetic metal. Hereinafter, a conventional inductor having a coil wound around a magnetic core will be described with reference to the accompanying drawings. FIG. 1 is a perspective view illustrating a conventional solenoid inductor. FIGS. 2A and 2B are circuit diagrams illustrating a circuit configuration of the conventional inductor. As illustrated in FIGS. 1 and 2A, the conventional inductor is a solenoid induct
